Passage 2:

If you want to send a message to a friend in another city, you can make a telephone call. If you have computer, you can send an e-mail. In the early 1800s, there were no computers, and Alexander Graham bell had not yet invented telephone. Most people wrote letters, but mail was slower than it is today. Mail traveled by boat or horseback, so a letter could take a very long time to go from one city to another.

A man named Samuel Morse thought that people should have a faster way to send messages. Morse knew that some scientists had been working to solve this problem, and he began experimenting too. He had heard about machines that sent controlled bursts of electricity over wires. He built a better machine than the other scientists. His machine-the telegraph- sent short and long bursts of electricity over very long wires.

2	Next, Morse's partner, Alfred, Vail, designed a code for sending messages. In his code, the short and long bursts of energy were combined in different ways. Each combination stood for a letter of alphabet. for example, a short and a long burst stood for the letter A. One long and three short bursts stood for the letter B. With Morse code , people could send messages over long distances in a short period of time. There were many changes in communication after Morse's invention. The telegraph caught on, and wires were strung from city to city. People were informed about important news more quickly than ever before. Businesspeople used the telegraph to buy and sell products. People could send messages across the country in minutes, instead of months. 59.
