Some scientists think that the seven continents that exist in the world were once a single land mass. The continents today are Asia, Africa, Australia, Europe, North and South America, and Antarctica. These scientists, called geologists say that the continents began to break away from one giant mass about 225 million years ago. This was the time when huge reptiles, such as dinosaurs, were beginning to develop. The land mass first broke into two pieces. Some geologists feel this was caused by melted rock from the center of the earth coming up through cracks in the ocean floor. Twenty five million years after the first split, one of the two continents divided again. These splits continued until the last division, which took place about 65 million years ago. At this time, Australia and Antarctica became separate continents and also mammals animals began replacing reptiles as the most important animals on earth. But how did scientists discover this possibility?

They studied ancient rocks. When rocks that became hard 225 million years ago were found in both Africa and Asia, scientists guessed that they were part of the melted rock that split the two continents.

If the idea of continental drift is true, then the continents as they exist today should fit together like the pieces of jigsaw puzzle.

Reading Comprehension 2 (نمره ۲)

Some scientists claim that color can have a dramatic effect on our health. The idea is not a new one. The ancient Aztecs used to paint themselves in different colors to relieve pain. The theory is that all biochemical structures, whether they are human, plants or animals, respond to light and as colors give out different amounts of light, each of them will automatically do us good or harm.

The idea that color affects our health is supported by research in new England, USA, where twenty - five people were exposed to blue light for a limited period, then to red light for the same amount of time. The blue light lowered the blood pressure of all the volunteers, leaving them very calm. But when the light became red, they all grew more active and, in some cases, even aggressive, as their blood pressures soared. The most interesting thing about this study is that a small proportion of the people were blind.

A similar study, which was carried out at the university of Alberta in Canada, showed that when they were placed in a blue room, a group of hyperactive children all became noticeably calmer, and again, a few of the subjects were blind. It is possible they were simply reacting to the other children, but color therapists would argue that this was the effect of the light.

57- The scientists showed that

- 1) blue was the most effective light
- 2) aggressive people don't like blue
- 3) blind people were sensitive to light
- 4) blood pressure increased the effect of color

58- The “soared” in line 10 means?

- 1) changed
- 2) decreased
- 3) refused
- 4) increased
