The cheetah, which is a large cat, is a good hunter and the fastest animal on earth. Cheetahs have two main habitats - grasslands and deserts in Africa and Asia. African cheetahs have enough space and food to survive in large numbers. But Asiatic cheetahs are an endangered species. According to one scientist, there are only a few hundred left in the world. The last Asiatic cheetah in captivity was 9-year-old Marita. She was found as a cub and raised by zookeepers.

The biggest enemy to the Asiatic cheetah's survival is its human predators, Hunters go into protected areas to catch them. Their speeding cars run over the cats. They also hunt gazelles, foxes, and hares the cheetah's primary food. (Some gazelles are as rare as cheetahs.) Farmers kill the big cats when they invade farms looking for food. Iran is the country with the most Asiatic cheetahs. The animals are safe in a large wildlife area supported by the Iranian government. But cheetahs avoid people, so they are very hard to spot even there. Scientists know when a cheetah is in an area by its tracks. Those large paw prints are all most researchers ever see of a cheetah. But scientists are happy anyway. They hope to see more and more tracks as the cheetah population grows.
